PUBLIC ART
BRIEF

Integrated Artwork Rhodes Station Precinct
City of Canada Bay
May 2019

Billbergia and the City of Canada Bay is seeking to commission a major public artwork integrated into the Station Precinct at Rhodes to reflect upon the cultural context and local community in Rhodes.

Opportunity for Artists

The City of Canada Bay is seeking Expressions of Interest from artists for a public artwork in the design of the public domain of the Station Precinct Rhodes. The work should integrate broader directions in place making and themes outlined in the Public Art plan for Rhodes. This exciting project seeks to establish strong connections with the local community in Rhodes.

The Vision

The vision is for a major public artwork to be integrated into the architectural design and surrounds of the precinct. The art is to be innovative, vibrant, have integrity, and be of the highest quality. It is to connect with the local culturally diverse community, site and environment and create a meaningful sense of place.

Objectives require the artwork be integrated into the built environment, and to be contemporary and relevant.

Public Art Principles

Council has invested in the development of a Rhodes Peninsular Public Arts Plan for Rhodes which outlines principals guiding the development of public art in the area. An important part of this place making plan is that the public art is enjoyed by the incoming residents, workers and visitors as well as the existing local community.

Potential Themes

The main themes are in relation to the histories and stories of the local community. The process of social transformation from pre-colonial indigenous cultures, to industrial uses of the site then to urban renewal is an important story. Artworks could explore links with the past industrial history of the peninsular or connections between the river as a place of flux, change, and mode of transportation critical to its success.

Rhodes Community

The aspirations for the new rapidly developing neighbourhood in Rhodes are for a healthy, sustainable, vibrant and contemporary community life. In 2019 Rhodes Peninsula's population is over 13,000 more than double the number in 2006, and it is predicted to rise to 20,000 people by 2036 when complete. The community of Rhodes Peninsula is characterised by a large well educated working population with a relatively high incomes. The emerging population is young, mobile and ethnically diverse with 70% of residents born overseas. The most commonly spoken languages other than English are Mandarin, Cantonese, Korean and Hindi. Part of a new wave of global migration with progressive aspirations and ideas, their mobility and intercultural connectivity is possible through technology and travel.

Background

Rhodes History

Colonial & Industrial History

In the colonial period, Thomas Walker's property, Rhodes, gave the area its name. The estate gave way to industrial growth west and south of the railway line, and a residential area north and east. Industries such as Union Carbide, Tulloch's Plant and Berger's Paints flourished until the 1980s, when it was proposed to remediate and regenerate the peninsula into mixed use residential, commercial and retail development.

In 1987 Sydney University biologist Dr John Pollak advised the government that a more thorough remedial treatment programme was needed for Rhodes. Clean up technologies were in their infancy and research was conducted into onsite and off-site methods being used globally. Concord Council pushed for more comprehensive dioxin testing of fish and sediments particularly in the sludge in front of the old Union Carbide site, and the City of Canada Bay contracted Thiess to carry out the remediation of the area including some Homebush Bay sediment.

The Brief: Sites and Opportunities

The Station Precinct is a 3.15 hectare site in central Rhodes to the west of Rhodes Train Station. The Master Plan for this development site incorporates new mixed use development (including 1400 new dwellings and a retail and commercial hub) and public open space.

The first stage of the redevelopment includes two residential towers for 548 units above three levels of retail and commercial space and basement car parking. A unique feature of the project is a heliostat architectural feature on one of the towers, which will guide sunlight to Rhodes Union Square.

Future stages will involve additional residential towers, retail and commercial space and a multi-purpose leisure centre funded through contributions from a Voluntary Planning Agreement, with Council.

The opportunity is for an artist to create a fretwork design to be integrated into key building columns and elements along the Walker Street entrances to the site. Fretwork is a decorative design or low relief, or cut outs on a solid background. Fretwork is commonly used to adorn/decorate architecture, and was originally an ornamental design.

BERGER'S

PIONEERS SINCE 1760

Always there must be a pioneer . . . always there must be someone with the foresight, the ambition and the courage to blaze new pathways for the benefit of mankind. Such a man was young Mr. Berger when he established his tory dry colour business in London in 1760.

Today, Berger Products are everywhere — in the air, on the water, in homes and offices, in cities, on farms — beautifying . . . and promoting prosperity and investments from the ravages of time. Constant vigilance by research experts, together with the accumulated knowledge of 178 years of manufacturing experience, enables the House of Berger to produce finishes to meet present-day requirements — and to continue to pioneer new formulae for the greater benefit of the community.
